

CHILD STAR GROUNDED

The Calgary Sun
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: G15
Section: Entertainment
Byline: BY CP
Dateline: TORONTO
Source:
Edition: Final
Story Type: Supplement
Note: Get Out
Length: 647 words

Illustration: 1. photo; FULL-SIZED FAME ... Daniel Cook is a star on both sides of the border. Above: A younger Cook learns to fly. ; 2. photo; He waits to interview then-Prime Minister Paul Martin for CTV.

His TV show is a hit in Canada and the U.S.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, and several other educational channels across Canada, and even on Playhouse Disney in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void. "There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the campaign by asking him who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

As for Harper?

"I think he'll make a pretty good prime minister, but I thought Paul Martin was doing a great job."

Season 2 of This is Daniel Cook has begun on Treehouse. A second DVD compilation of previous episodes is due Feb. 28.

He regrets he's had no callbacks yet from some movie auditions, though.

Cook says he's pondering future series ideas and would especially like to do something involving his favourite pastime, dinosaurs.

Asked if he was satisfied with the allowance he gets

as a bona fide TV personality (his parents won't say how much he makes), Daniel immediately took the bait.

"I want more! You could raise it by $200," he says turning to his nearby parents.

When it's suggested he just might be able to fire mom and dad -- who works in the computer industry -- his eyes widen with glee.

"OK, your interview is over!" dad declares with mock anger.

© 2006 Sun Media Corporation. All rights reserved.

TV's Cook prefers dinosaurs to fame

The StarPhoenix (Saskatoon)

Fri 17 Feb 2006

Page: B6

Section: Lifestyle

Byline:

Dateline: TORONTO

Source: Canadian Press

Edition: Final

Story Type: News

Length: 622 words

Illustration: Photo: Canadian Press / Daniel Cook learns to fly in a scene from his hit TV show

TORONTO (CP) -- His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model, but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

Season Two of This is Daniel Cook began on Treehouse in December. A second DVD compilation of previous TV episodes is scheduled for release Feb. 28.

He regrets that he's had no callbacks yet from some movie auditions, though.

Cook says he's pondering future series ideas and would especially like to do something involving his favourite pastime, dinosaurs. His favourite prehistoric lizard?

A monstrous meat-eater called the Giganotosaurus. And he can spell it, too: "g-i-g-a-n-o-t-o-s-a-u-r-u-s."

Asked if he was satisfied with the allowance he gets as a bona fide TV personality (his parents won't say how much he makes), Daniel immediately took the bait.

"I want more! You could raise it by $200," he says turning to his nearby parents.

When it's suggested he just might be able to fire mom and dad -- who works in the computer industry -- his eyes widen with glee.

"OK, your interview is over!" dad declares with mock anger.

He's a TV star at 8

The Expositor (Brantford)

Fri 17 Feb 2006

Page: C5

Section: Entertainment

Byline: John McKay

Dateline: TORONTO

Source: Canadian Press

Edition: Final

Story Type: News

Length: 511 words

Illustration: Photo: Canadian Press / Daniel learns to fly in a scene from This Is Daniel Cook, airing on Treehouse.

TORONTO - His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

© 2006 Osprey Media Group Inc. All rights reserved.

Daniel Cook not your typical child celebrity

The Barrie Examiner
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: C4
Section: Entertainment
Byline:
Dateline: TORONTO
Source: Canadian Press
Edition: Final
Story Type: News
Length: 258 words

TORONTO (CP) -- His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook of Stoney Creek is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age."

© 2006 Osprey Media Group Inc. All rights reserved.

Eight-year-old unfazed by life as television star

The Daily News (Halifax)
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: 25
Section: Daily Entertainment
Byline:
Source: The Canadian Press
Edition:
Length: 241 words
Illustration: daniel Cook

His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website sells T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28.

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

As for Harper?

"I think he'll make a pretty good prime minister, but I thought Paul Martin was doing a great job."

© 2006 Transcontinental Media G.P. All rights reserved.

Daniel Cook, the boy wonder; Prodigy - TV star likes fame and politics, but he still prefers dinosaurs

The Daily Gleaner (Fredericton)
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: B4
Section: Life
Byline: By JOHN McKAY The Canadian Press
Source:
Note:
Length: 509 words

His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show - in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing - was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself.

Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

© 2006 The Daily Gleaner (Fredericton)

Cook a kid first and a star second

The Daily Courier (Kelowna)

Fri 17 Feb 2006

Page: C9

Section: Entertainment

Byline: John McKay

Dateline: TORONTO

Source: The Canadian Press

Edition: Final

Story Type: News

Length: 608 words

Illustration: Photo: The Canadian Press / Daniel Cook learns to fly in a scene from This Is Daniel Cook, airing on Treehouse as well as on a Disney Channel in the U.S.

TORONTO -- His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model, but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he said.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV.

"Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

As for Harper?

"I think he'll make a pretty good prime minister, but I thought Paul Martin was doing a great job."

Season Two of This is Daniel Cook began on Treehouse in December. A second DVD compilation of previous TV episodes is scheduled for release Feb. 28.

He regrets that he's had no callbacks yet from some movie auditions, though.

Cook says he's pondering future series ideas and would especially like to do something involving his favourite pastime, dinosaurs. His favourite prehistoric lizard?

A monstrous meat-eater called the Giganotosaurus. And he can spell it, too: "g-i-g-a-n-o-t-o-s-a-u-r-u-s."

© 2006 The Okanagan Valley Newspaper Group. All rights reserved.

Daniel Cook enjoys fame and politics, but is still just a kid: Eight-year-old is a star in Canada and the U.S.

The Packet & Times (Orillia)
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: A7
Section: Entertainment
Byline: John McKay
Dateline: TORONTO
Source: The Canadian Press
Edition: Final
Story Type: News
Length: 401 words

TORONTO -- His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model, but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally, we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but, when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry).

© 2006 Osprey Media Group Inc. All rights reserved.

TV star Daniel Cook likes fame, but prefers dinosaurs

The Telegram (St. John's)
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: B4
Section: Arts/Entertainment
Byline: John McKay
Source: CP
Edition:
Length: 509 words
Illustration: Daniel Cook learns to fly in a scene from This Is Daniel Cook, airing on Treehouse as well as on a Disney Channel in the U.S.

His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States. He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

'I think I'd rather be the interviewer,' Daniel says after thinking about it.

'No offence!' he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show - in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing - was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

'There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

'He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name.'

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

'They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!' he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

'Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!'

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride.

He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

'It was quite fun, I really liked it,' the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. 'Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more.'

© 2006 Transcontinental Media G.P. All rights reserved.

Daniel Cook, 8, likes fame, but he prefers Transformers

Standard-Freeholder (Cornwall)

Fri 17 Feb 2006

Page: 18

Section: Entertainment

Byline:

Dateline: TORONTO

Source: Canadian Press

Edition: Final

Story Type: News

Length: 511 words

Illustration: Photo: Canadian Press / LEARNING TO FLY: Daniel learns to fly in a scene from This Is Daniel Cook, airing on Treehouse as well as on a Disney Channel in the U.S.

TORONTO (cp) His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

© 2006 Osprey Media Group Inc. All rights reserved.

TV star likes fame and politics, but prefers dinosaurs

Prince George Citizen
Fri 17 Feb 2006
Page: 26
Section: Entertainment
Byline: John McKay
Dateline: TORONTO
Source: Canadian Press
Edition: Final
Story Type: News
Length: 512 words
Illustration: Colour Photo: Associated Press / Daniel learns to fly in a scene from This Is Daniel Cook, airing on Treehouse as well as on a Disney Channel in the U.S.

TORONTO (CP) -- His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States. He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show -- in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing -- was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

© 2006 Prince George Citizen

TV star Daniel Cook, 8, likes fame and politics, but prefers dinosaurs

CP Wire
Thu 16 Feb 2006
Section: Entertainment and culture
Byline: BY JOHN MCKAY
Source:
Length: 694 words

TORONTO (CP) _ His TV show is a hit in Canada and the United States.

He's mobbed by fans at McDonald's and Disney World.

His website offers T-shirts, clocks and bumper stickers plastered with his image. CTV even hired him to interview the federal party leaders during the recent election campaign.

And Daniel Cook, of Stoney Creek, Ont., is only eight years old.

Perhaps the most amazing thing about the little red-head in the trademark orange shirt is that he doesn't seem to be one of those Hollywood-type kids.

You know, eight going on 28?

He seems to be, well, just a regular kid who happens to be the star of This Is Daniel Cook, seen on Treehouse TV, TVOntario, several other educational channels across Canada, and even on the Playhouse Disney channel in the U.S.

During a recent interview, he was asked which he preferred, being interviewed, or doing interviews on his own show.

"I think I'd rather be the interviewer," Daniel says after thinking about it.

"No offence!" he hastily adds for the reporter's sake. None taken.

A pilot for his show _ in which Daniel tries out jobs ranging from construction work to chocolate making and disco dancing _ was prepared back when the youngster was only five.

Executive producer Mark Bishop says the program filled a void.

"There's so much animation out there, which kids love and enjoy and will always be there, but (educational broadcasters wanted) role models for preschoolers being able to see themselves reflected onscreen with kids that are their own age.

"He's a role model but he's also a friend. And they all know he's Daniel Cook. That's his real name."

Bishop says Cook has to wear a hoodie and sunglasses when he goes to McDonald's and recalls one question-and-answer session with fans where youngsters just wanted to come up and touch him to see if he was real.

"They couldn't understand how he got out of the TV!" he says.

There was a similar reaction at Disney World last June after Daniel's show began airing on Playhouse Disney.

"Literally we had kids and parents coming up to him. 'Is that Daniel Cook? That's Daniel Cook?' And the show had only been on for two weeks!"

Cook himself appears to take it all in stride. He signs autographs and answers fan mail, but when he gets bored, he plays with his Transformer toys (or his BlackBerry) and sometimes his mom has to take him aside to get him to focus.

When he does, the results can be fascinating.

He stopped Stephen Harper in his tracks during the election campaign by asking the Conservative leader who he would vote for if he couldn't vote for himself. Harper could only mutter something about preferring to jump off a roof. Daniel swears he thought up the question all by himself.

"It was quite fun, I really liked it," the fledgling reporter says about his political assignment for CTV. "Politics, it's pretty neat, now that I've gotten to see more about what they do, I'm liking it more."

As for Harper?

"I think he'll make a pretty good prime minister, but I thought Paul Martin was doing a great job."

Season Two of This is Daniel Cook began on Treehouse in December. A second DVD compilation of previous TV episodes is scheduled for release Feb. 28.

He regrets that he's had no callbacks yet from some movie auditions, though.

Cook says he's pondering future series ideas and would especially like to do something involving his favourite pastime, dinosaurs. His favourite prehistoric lizard?

A monstrous meat-eater called the Giganotosaurus. And he can spell it, too: "g-i-g-a-n-o-t-o-s-a-u-r-u-s."

Asked if he was satisfied with the allowance he gets

as a bona fide TV personality (his parents won't say how much he makes), Daniel immediately took the bait.

"I want more! You could raise it by $200," he says turning to his nearby parents.

When it's suggested he just might be able to fire mom and dad _ who works in the computer industry _ his eyes widen with glee.

"OK, your interview is over!" dad declares with mock anger.

On the Net: www.thisisdanielcook.com

Copyright © 2006 The Canadian Press